Mind games playing is more or less a way of life for MANY Nigerians - whether those living in the country or based abroad.

I say this based on YEARS of personal experiences and observations from interacting with people in Nigeria (often quite closely/for extended periods) in my business and personal life. [TIP: You have a right to disagree with the assertion I've made above - feel free to jump up and down, and even tear your hair out. But if you wish to engage me in discussion about the views I've expressed here, be sure to observe ALL the rules of polite and intelligent conversation. Thanks in advance :-)]

I'm NOT alone. There are others willing to say it like it is. In particular, I've come across more than one non-Nigerian/African who has noticed this negative tendency while living/working with Nigerians.

For instance, an American expatriate who spent some years doing business in Nigeria, connected with me on Skype in 2012, after we'd met on LinkedIn.com and got talking about doing business in Nigeria.

What I liked about Greg M. (his real first name and initial for his surname) was that he was willing to NOT be Politically Correct or needlessly diplomatic. He wasted no time in stating that one of the greatest frustrations he experienced (apart from erratic power supply) while still in Nigeria, as a business person was the preference most people he had to relate with, display for mind games of all kinds.

I could relate quite well with what he said, and I told him so. Today, very little has changed in that regard. Indeed, it's that peculiar tendency that led to the pre-qualification steps I put in place in my sales leads generation process (which is now 100% online based) to screen people who reach out to me, so I can be sure they are NOT time wasters...or worse.

In it, I bring my experience based knowledge and insights to bear in informing and educating relevant others, about the antics of naughty people in society, who play mind games with the intent to manipulate, deceive and exploit unsuspecting others.

These emotionally UN-intelligent individuals CAN (and WILL, if you let them!) use their mind games to (among other things):

1. Make you work for them for LESS or NO pay...
2. Get you to share your new/original ideas, so they can later pass them off as theirs to others (e.g plagiarism)...
3. Establish a relationship with you, that they then exploit to make false claims to reap benefits they seek elsewhere (e.g a client that listed my name as an EMPLOYEE-in their business plan presentation for a bank loan without my knowledge or consent!).

Like I stated in the audio, my ultimate purpose for sharing this post and podcast bundle is to provide a public service of sorts. *ALL the stories I've shared are 100% true (despite the shocking nature of some), and they happened to me, personally.
